

Dear DANDRITES

Young DANDRITE (YoDA) is inviting you to a hybrid Career Café, our guest is Juliane Martin, who did her PhD at DANDRITE. She will present her journey along her career path.

My career path from science to management consulting

I (Juliane) always had the intention to become a scientist, to do basic research in neuroscience. And yet, 2.5 years after defending my PhD, here I am, working at Boston Consulting Group as an Associate consultant. It seems, this job couldn't be further away from my educational background and original professional aspirations. Nevertheless, my years in science definitely helped me prepare for my current tasks and responsibilities. So, after all, my career choice might not be as unusual as some would think.

In this session of the career café, I want to specifically address the opportunities we have as scientists outside of academia, with a focus on consulting. I will talk about my career path and what drove my transition from science to consulting. I will give a brief introduction on what management consulting actually is and what I do in my daily work. And most importantly, I want to highlight what consulting firms are nowadays looking for, how a science background helps you on the job and also what you can expect from consulting firms as employers.

Juliane is looking forward to an open and engaging discussion!
